

ABSTRACT

Eliminating the friction between the packing material and the inner surface of a chromatographic column during the packing of the column provides a column that has a stationary phase that is substantially radially homogenous within the column. A preferred way to eliminate the friction is by vibrating the column in a direction substantially parallel to its long axis.